.... The occupying invader forces use telephone communications for espionage and investigation purposes in order to suppress Afghans. This is against all international standards. Therefore, the Islamic Emirate of Afghanistan has decided to ban the use of mobile phone services at night in order to protect the Afghan people and the Mujahideen, who are constantly fighting against the enemy of Islam. Additionally, our fellow Afghans and Mujahideen have noticed that the trial implementation of the decision in some parts of the country has already yielded positive results. The invader enemies use their equipment to spy on telephones mainly from sunset to sunrise. Because nights have grown longer and days are shorter now, the Islamic Emirate has also shortened the standard usage time of mobile phone services. Cellular communication companies will be permitted to provide communication services from 6:30 am in the morning to 5:00 pm in the afternoon in the cities and rural areas. We reiterate that the companies should halt their operations at night time

Afghan and NATO officials said atleast 100 militants were killed early Sunday by Afghan soldiers and NATO airstrikes after the militants launched a surprise attack on the provincial capital of Lashkar Gah. They said more militants were killed in three days of clashes and airstrikes in Helmand's Nad Ali district, which has been under militant control until now. That battle ended Saturday. Cell Phone, As A Tool For Ideological Struggle

A radical new plan is being considered by the UK government to counter growing Taliban public awareness campaign against the invaders in Afghanistan. The programme involves using new media like mobile phones and the internet to propagandise the ordinary Afghans to contradict the prevailing Taliban true message. Non-governmental organisations would distribute mobile phones to Afghans so they can make their own video diaries. Anti-Western films already circulate on Afghanistan's estimated 6 m mobiles. These films are also distributed among the country's half a million internet users. Whitehall officials say the aim is to deprive the Taliban of its virtual monopoly on educating Afghans about our evil plans using new media. BBC security correspondent Frank Gardner said there is a growing realisation in Whitehall and Washington that the US-led coalition has been losing the propaganda war in Afghanistan to the Taliban. The coalition's reputation was particularly damaged by the recent distribution of mobile phone footage showing the bodies of dozens of Afghan civilians martyred in a US-led raid in August, our correspondent added. They're willing to give poor Afghans mobile phones while there is still a food shortage over there. This isn't exactly the way to win the war of "hearts and minds."

Statement regarding mobile phone usage restrictions

The Mujahid nation of Afghanistan is faced with a stubborn and rebellious enemy that has no commitment to any national or international standards. Given this information, The Islamic Emirate of Afghanistan is compelled to adopt measures that force decisions on some complicated and challenging issues.

The occupying invader forces use telephone communications for espionage and investigation purposes in order to suppress Afghans. This is against all international standards.

Therefore, the Islamic Emirate of Afghanistan has decided to ban the use of mobile phone services at night in order to protect the Afghan people and the Mujahideen, who are constantly fighting against the enemy of Islam.

Additionally, our fellow Afghans and Mujahideen have noticed that the trial implementation of the decision in some parts of the country has already yielded positive results.

The invader enemies use their equipment to spy on telephones mainly from sunset to sunrise. Because nights have grown longer and days are shorter now, the Islamic Emirate has also shortened the standard usage time of mobile phone services. Cellular communication companies will be permitted to provide communication services from 6:30 am in the morning to 5:00 pm in the afternoon in the cities and rural areas. We reiterate that the companies should halt their operations at night time.

The Mujahideen of the Islamic Emirate of Afghanistan are and will remain committed to implementing the decision. Mobile companies will be held responsible if they do not put the decision into practice. Mobile companies will also face strict consequences for non-compliance
